

Middleware is software that acts as a bridge or intermediate layer between two separate applications, services, or components, enabling them to communicate and share data.

Think of middleware as a plumbing system or a concierge in a building: when a request comes in from a visitor (client), it passes through security, identity verification, and logging before reaching the specific office room (application logic) they want to visit.